Sure They Can Find Caivin.

Within the past few days Mr. Gorion has been in communication with pavis in the hope of locating Caivin, but with poor success. The protest igainst the manner in which the public was treated by the New York Association in the distribution of tickets in the charge that they were disposed of by members of the two teams or speculating purposes, has made in investigation necessary, and it is believed here that the warrant for he arrest of Caivin may have a senational effect in clearing methods which were violently denounced. In he case of Mr. Gordon, for instance, while regretting the notoriety, he said that he would prefer that to being derauded and then remain silent, especially when he became a party to the ransaction solely because he was satisfied Caivin was dealing direct with avis.

That was the last time he had seen Calvin until a few days before the world's series games, when Calvin came to him and desired when Calvin came to him and desired to purchase some seats. He told Calvin that he would be unable to help him as each players was allotted twenty-five tickets, and that it would require more than this number to secommodate his (Davie's) personal friends here.
